

HISTORY MINOR

A minor in history provides a solid foundation for lifelong learning and an appreciation for the historian's craft. Students get hands-on experience accessing primary sources materials through numerous archives. Supported by award-winning faculty, students learn to read source materials with proper context and can choose from among a variety of history courses on topics that interest them. Undergraduates also benefit from our esteemed graduate program in public history and may take courses in public history, some of which include an internship in a museum, archive or public institution. History complements many primary areas of study, such as languages and cultures, pre-law, pre-health, political science, economics, business, journalism and more.
