Women's and Gender Studies prepares students to think critically about gender and equality through the lens of social justice. Students learn to engage with the community to explore gender and its intersections with other social identities, health and justice. The skills gained in our program enable students to succeed in an increasingly globally-minded and diverse world.

Emerging from activist traditions, the program serves the university, local, national and global communities by acting as a resource and guide for issues related to women and gender. This interdisciplinary program offers a Bachelor of Arts track, or a student may pursue a minor to strengthen a variety of disciplines — from anthropology to English, philosophy to psychology, religious studies to public health.
